TUMULT IN THE PROXY SOLICITATION INDUSTRY AS THE “ASSETS” TAKE THE ELEVATORS DOWN AT NIGHT...AND RIDE NEW ONES UP NEXT DAY

ISSUERS ASK, “WHO MOVED MY CHEESE?” and “WHO’S WHO IN THIS SUDDENLY CRAZY SPACE?” AND “WHAT, IF ANYTHING, SHOULD WE BE DOING?”

Issuers have been stunned, and our phones have sure been ringing off the hooks, following historically unprecedented movements of key people in the always somewhat tumultuous proxy solicitation industry.

“What’s going on here?” The simple answer is that many solicitation and advisory firms geared up big-time – adding call center seats and spending-up big on marketing and promotional activities, and on T&E – with the expectation that issuers would be spooked, and sometimes in dire straits with the loss of the “broker vote” – and that outbound calling campaigns and last minute “saves” would fill their coffers to overflowing. And with big companies literally swimming in cash, lots of M&A activity was also anticipated for 2010...which proved to be a classic case of a “perpetually receding bonanza” – one that forced folks to chase it faster than ever...and to cut their prices to the bone when they did have a chance to lasso a deal. But the fact is it takes a lot of cash to keep a proxy solicitation and advisory firm open all year...and those “human assets” don’t come cheaply either...at least the really valuable ones.

So no surprise really, that in the face of forced spending cutbacks across the board, many of the most talented people – and especially the “rainmakers” – would be looking for greener pastures to irrigate...and jumping the fences if they could find some. And find some they did. In fact, more than half the people who’d normally be in our PEOPLE column need to be mentioned here instead.

At Laurel Hill, as we reported in our last issue, almost all the “human capital” took the elevator down one day – after running up a truly amazing record for new business, in just two short years – and took the elevator up the next day in another building, as Phoenix Advisors. In a trice, they got themselves acquired by transfer agent AST, which – clearly flush with cash from their relatively new Australian private equity owners – is hell bent to grow, and to expand into newer and potentially greener pastures asap. Within their first few days of existence Phoenix Advisors racked up one of the four tombstones that ran in the WSJ that month – heralding what now looks to be a late but welcome flood of M&A deals on the horizon. On the 'people front' – following the exits of rainmakers Tom Kies...then John Siemann, David Bobker and David Weeks...Ron Schneider, who'd only recently jumped the fence to L-H from BNY-Mellon's proxy business...jumped to Phoenix Advisors. And fast on his heels – from BNY-Mellon, where he was a mainstay from the very beginning of their proxy business – came Pete Tomaszewski, aka Pete Thomas, one of the solidest operational and client-service guys around.

But Laurel Hill came back slugging, with one of the very best ads we've ever seen: an eye-riveting, heavily muscled prize-fighter's back reminded us that "Strength is about more than just muscles" – and forced us to read the equally strong and powerful message below: "Strength is...about CHARACTER... When faced with adversity, look to those who remain professional...about RESILIENCY... When let down by others, look to those who focus on the road ahead and move forward...about FAITH..." in a trusted brand name. And frankly, Laurel Hill does indeed seem to have the financial muscle, and the will to move strongly ahead. After quickly adding two industry veterans, Sam Berrios and Wilton Davila to fill in the bullpen, they recruited a prominent and very well thought of guy from the governance scene, Francis Byrd, who's done solid stints at the Altman Group, Moody's, the New York City Pension Fund and Georgeson.

In the thick of all this came the sad news that the Altman Group was shutting down the first-rate proxy solicitation business it had built in New Jersey...although, please note, it will continue its long-established and very well thought of business dedicated to mutual fund proxy solicitation and advisory services from NYC.

And fast on the heels of these developments, Alliance Advisors – two of whose founders, Michael and Kevin Mackey were among the original owners of CIC (which had a very special and highly successful focus on smaller and mid-cap companies – and which they had sold to Georgeson in) would, in addition to continuing the "advisory services" they had been offering, get back into the proxy solicitation business...this they proceeded to do immediately...by hiring superstars Peter Casey, and Dominic de Robertis for the front office and Joe Caruso for the critically important "back office"... from Altman. Both were soon followed by another Altman superstar, Charlotte Brown, whose career goes back to "the old CIC" and who seems to be known and loved by every single person in the small and mid-cap corporate community. We predict that the Alliance crew will once again become very big, and very strong players in this business.

Just as fast, as we reported briefly in our last issue, Tom Montrone, the president of Registrar & Transfer Company, hired three Altman veterans, Joe Contorno, Jason Vinick and James Gill to offer proxy solicitation services to R&T's large stable of TA customers under the brand name of Eagle Rock Proxy Advisors. Having done something similar, way back in the early 1980s, and knowing what he knows about the small and mid-cap universe and about R&T's strong reputation for solid service, your editor predicts that Eagle Rock will also develop a very solid business here, in fairly short order.

Meanwhile...we had been watching to see where Altman's top proxy-fighter and rainmaker Paul Schulman would land...since, if you haven't quite gotten one of the main takeaways here, this business is really about the PEOPLE who make it tick. Just as we began drafting this issue came the news that he's landed at one of the biggest and strongest proxy-fight firms around...MacKenzie Partners, so yippee for them.

So what do we think about the other firms in this increasingly crowded field?? Let's start with Innisfree, which, like MacKenzie Partners is almost always on one side or the other of every proxy fight and every big M&A deal that goes down. What more really needs to be said, we'd ask... except, maybe, that both firms can still command considerable premium-pricing-power vs. the field as a whole.

Georgeson seems to us to come out as a pretty good winner in today's environment too, thanks to their brand name, which is still the best known anywhere...and to their size...and to their big stable of good people to boot.

D.F. King seems to have come through the financial crunch and all the sturm und drang rather smoothly – basically by sticking to its knitting. Ditto for Morrow &

Company. Both firms have been widely mentioned on the rumor mill as up for sale – Morrow because it’s mostly owned by a person...and DFK because it’s mostly owned by a private-equity firm. There’s probably a lot of wishful thinking at work here, since clearly, the field is way too crowded for its own good. But let’s face it; everything is up for sale...for the right price. We think there’s little chance of getting an offer that one could not refuse in today’s overcrowded marketplace, although with all the old competition – plus three brand new entrants – the “price of bacon” seems certain to continue to fall, which is bad news for solicitors and their owners, but good news for issuers.

BNY-Mellon tells us that they are still committed to offering proxy services to their big stable of TA clients when needed, many of whom do not need to retain a solicitor as a “steady date.”

And we’d be remiss if we failed to mention Regan and Associates, where Artie Regan, Jim Dougan and Gary Thomas – seasoned industry veterans who have special expertise in the kinds of issues that plague smaller-companies – including proxy fights, of course – and who have small-company-friendly pricing besides – have been holding forth for a very long time and enjoy a very loyal following.

So what should issuers be doing? Follow the talent... especially the talent that’s assigned to YOU and your company...And watch those rainmakers especially, since they can and do make or break the bottom line where they hang their hats – or decide to hang them up. Some issuers may want to push back on the price of bacon, or to ask themselves “What has my proxy solicitor been doing for me lately?” Interestingly, three companies we heard from volunteered that they felt like second-class citizens in recent years, and were mighty miffed. We have been saying that in today’s environment, every company ought to have a proxy solicitor they are comfortable with, that could quickly spring into action for them – even if they do not need to use their services every single year. And if you have a good person or team that makes you feel truly comfortable, there’s no big need to rock the boat. ■

ACTIVIST INVESTORS, THE PRESS...AND OTHER PROFESSIONAL “NOISEMAKERS” GANG UP AGAINST VIRTUAL SHAREHOLDER MEETINGS

Your editor has had the great fun of participating in three panels devoted to Virtual Shareholder Meetings over the past 40 days or so. The first was hosted by Gary Lutin, who has been running a Shareholder Forum on this subject. The second was hosted by the panel-builder, interlocutor and commenter par excellence, Broc Romanek, of the Corporate Counsel and the third panel was put on at the Western Regional Conference of the Society of Corporate Secretaries and Governance Officers.

Each panel included speakers from Intel, which hosted the very first Virtual Shareholder Meeting where shareholders could actually cast votes over the web; from Broadridge Financial Solutions, which provides technical, audio-visual and webcasting support, along with real-time voting capabilities for VMs...and which hosted its own totally virtual meeting this year...and from BestBuy, which used a “hybrid model” – a virtual meeting in addition to an in-person venue – as the springboard for a much broader communications and brand-building effort than most shareholder meetings strive for these days. Broc’s panel, for the record, also included a panelist from Charles Schwab, which put a particular focus on reaching out to its employee shareholders through its V-M webcast.

Your editor opined along the way that Virtual Meetings are here to stay...that it’s inevitable that they will continue to catch on big-time...and that they not only pass his own sniff test where new technologies are concerned, they meet his 18 year old mission statement – and his statement as to what public companies should be doing – to a tee: “Helping to provide better, and more cost-effective services to investors” who, after all, pay the not inconsiderable bills for shareholder meetings.

We’ve also had the great fun of debating the pros and cons of Virtual Meetings with the still very skeptical Tim Smith of Walden Asset Management – a much admired friend and colleague who has been an originator and presenter of shareholder proposals and a “good governance hawk” of the first order for many, many years...in the hope of finding some common ground that will enable VMs to move forward with vigor, as we believe they should:

“I don’t want to seem like a Luddite here” Smith told us; “So Tim, you’ll have to work a bit harder then” we couldn’t resist responding...And we honestly believe that if we ALL work a bit harder, we can find a way to answer the open issues that stand in the way. So please read the article below, and please see our review of the Symantec virtual-only meeting too, and take time to listen to it yourselves, and form your own opinions... and please fire-back if you agree with us...or not. ■

OPTIMIZER TO ACTIVISTS AND NOISEMAKERS RE: VIRTUAL MEETINGS: YOU FOLKS ARE REALLY MISSING THE BOAT HERE!

Despite the many good things your editor, and other managers and consumers of Virtual Meetings have to say about them, they've been coming under heavy fire of late:

Activist Tim Smith of Walden Asset Management has presented Intel, Broadridge Financial Solutions and Procter & Gamble with drafts of shareholder proposals he has folks ready to file if they proceed with “totally virtual” meetings. Even though these three companies are widely regarded for their good corporate governance programs, Smith fears that other companies, who are NOT so good, will use VMs to “hide” from public scrutiny...and, as he told your editor, will consign ordinary shareholders, and the activist investors among them, to a “cyber-ghetto.”

P&G, signed a 5-year standstill agreement with members of a P&G founding-family once they saw the proposed proposal – though we ourselves could hardly imagine P&G successfully holding such a meeting under any circumstances, since they'd kill a cherished Cincinnati tradition and rile all their friends, neighbors, and consumers too, for no good purpose.

Intel, which would still LOVE to hold a virtual-only meeting, we think, has backed away, at least for now...but Broadridge says they'll forge ahead with a second virtual-only meeting in 2011.

Meanwhile, CalPERS and CalSTERS have gone on record as being totally against virtual-only meetings, and a bunch of activist investor websites (some of which we think have been launched primarily as “trolling opportunities” for sales of future banner-ads) have jumped on the bandwagon, looking to send virtual-only meetings to perdition.

Quickly jumping on the anti-VM bandwagon, NY Times columnist Gretchen Morgenson posted a lengthy rant in her Sunday, Sept. 28 column entitled “Fair Game” that focused on the recent Symantec Corporation virtual meeting; asserting in the headline that “Questions, And Directors [were] Lost in the Ether”...following a 9/27 story by reporter Ross Kerber of Reuters on the Symantec meeting headlined “Shareholder meetings via Web mute dissident voices.”

Then, despite our own belief that Symantec had done a mostly fine job with their meeting, they agreed to hold a “hybrid meeting” next year...which may turn out to be the only way a Fortune 500 company can go-virtual anymore.

So let's take a few minutes to review some of the benefits of Virtual Meetings – then to try to debunk some of the objections to them that seem clearly misguided from our perspective – and then to address a few issues that do indeed need to be addressed...all of which CAN be addressed to the total satisfaction of investors – both the activists and us ordinary folk, we believe – who, as mentioned, foot the bills for shareholder meetings:

Here are some of the things we really like about Virtual Shareholder Meetings:

- At 90%+ of the roughly 13,800 Annual and Special Meetings of Shareholders that are expected to be held this year, there is absolutely no good reason for investors to attend...except maybe they live nearby... and think there will be free breakfast. Typically, over 99% of the votes that will actually be cast at such meetings have been cast and counted the night before – and there are no “voting issues” or “performance issues” whatsoever from an investor's perspective. Thus, a “virtual only meeting” can be a huge money-saver for corporations... when such circumstances prevail.
- Having virtual voting capability – right up until the time the polls officially close – is actually a governance improvement vs. having a physical location only, for the overwhelming majority of shareholders who can't possibly show up to vote or change their vote in person.
- More importantly, virtual meetings provide public companies with a very cost-effective way to reach out to the many investors who do NOT live nearby, or who do not have the time or budget to attend a shareholder meeting in person...or who may be employees, or customers, or suppliers, or prospective investors, who may want to gain a bit of perspective about the company. As recent statistics on VMs confirm, companies that have held virtual meetings to date cite attendance figures that are two to three to seven or more times the numbers of people who typically attended live meetings. And most have seen modest but welcome improvements in the number of people who actually cast votes.
- The biggest and best innovation here, we think, many of the companies that have conducted virtual meetings to date have established web-based investor forums that are open to receive and to post investor questions – and answers – for 20-30 days before the meeting. Clearly, this has the potential to create a dialogue that is much more robust than the dialogue that takes place these days at most of those 13,000+ in-person meetings. It also alerts the management team to issues they may not have been aware of otherwise, and it gives both sides significant new opportunities to prepare their Qs & As with added care.
- Another very nice good governance feature, the proceedings are typically archived for at least a year, so investors who miss the actual meeting, or who want to check out exactly what was said (as we did after reading the Morgenson column) can do so for themselves...and can usually scroll back and forth to hear the fine points over and over again if they wish.

- As someone who has attended 10 or more shareholder meetings a year for 40 years now, your editor feels obliged to note that he greatly appreciates the carefully scripted and businesslike conduct of the “business part” of the meeting, which a “virtual meeting” forces companies to have. And most meeting attendees appreciate this too. Meeting-goers generally do NOT appreciate the fuzzy-logic, the rambling comments and the often un-businesslike antics of so many meeting gadflies – who tend to waste the time of normal attendees, and to make a mockery of the real business of a shareholder meeting. And sometimes the behaviors of people who come to the meeting specifically to disrupt it or co-opt it or to attract the attention of the media create potentially dangerous crowd-control issues...we’ve had many scary meeting moments.

Here are some areas where we feel the activist investors are totally missing the boat:

- Virtual Meetings – when properly conducted, that is – provide activist investors with unprecedented opportunities to present their viewpoints...and to present them to an infinitely larger audience than they could ever hope to reach in person.
- Activist investors actually tend to benefit significantly from being able to present their own case in a controlled and well-scripted manner – whether by reading their statement or, if they are reasonably telegenic, presenting it as part of a live or pre-recorded video-cast. (Here, your editor also feels obliged to note that in his long experience, most activists – and especially those pesky “gadflies” – tend to LOSE VOTES after making their case in person... But he has indeed witnessed cases where well-prepared activists DID influence the outcomes in their favor, to some degree, or sometimes set the table for a bigger and better campaign next year.
- The idea that virtual-only meetings provide an opportunity for companies to “hide” from investors is laughably and very demonstrably wrong – witness the recent flap over the Symantec VM. Let’s start with the fact that VMs must be announced well in advance, and are broadcast to a potentially infinite number of listeners. Remember too that all the VMs that we’re aware of have been archived on the web, where they are readily reviewable for at least a year. And, as we tried to convince our friend and valued colleague Tim Smith – who, by the way, is a very skilled and powerful presenter of shareholder proposals – perceived shortcomings, and especially any abuses that may occur are discovered in a flash...And they can and will be widely circulated and discussed both in the press and in cyberspace. Thus, from our perspective, VMs have a built-in and very powerful “self-correcting feature” if shareholders, or any other observers for that matter, feel that disclosures, or discussion, or the conduct of the meeting itself were to be deemed wanting.

Here, we say, is the one big issue with Virtual Meetings that needs to be resolved:

- We totally agree with Tim Smith that sometimes, investors need to confront the management team in person...to observe the way they respond – or not – to a direct challenge. We ourselves have made many wise investment and disinvestment decisions based on an up-close and personal look at the way management, and directors too, react under pressure.

And here, we say, is a reasonable way to resolve the issue, recognizing that the number of Shareholder Meetings where there are “issues” is a very small one; probably no more than 250 meetings a year, out of the 13,800-odd meetings that are projected for 2010...

- Taking a leaf from the way the Maryland legislature authorized “virtual meetings” we say that if even one shareholder of record asks to be present in person at a shareholder meeting, that shareholder, and any others of like mind, must be accommodated.
- Naturally, there must be a reasonable “notice period” for such requests...and we would suggest that 11 business days prior to the scheduled date is both a “reasonable period”, and one that would allow companies to disseminate the new information – over the web, and even via mail if the shareholders involved should insist.
- Companies should be free to offer shareholders an open phone line to the meeting, or the opportunity to submit a pre-recorded question or statement if they wish to make one, or to offer would-be spokespeople a chance to appear via a “live video-cast” that could be beamed from anywhere the proponent wishes, should the company wish to do so. (The technology here is increasingly available, and affordable, and often would cost a lot less than the travel for many proponents.) But the company should not be obliged to do any of this; they should still be free to have wannabe shareholder attendees attend at their own expense, as at present, if they don’t like the electronic alternatives. And, there should be two very important provisos; (1) the question(s) must pertain to the business that is officially before the meeting and (2) questions should be subject, as most are now, to “reasonable limits” on the time allowed for discussion of each matter before the meeting and on the number of questions a single proponent can ask - out of respect for the valuable time of other meeting attendees.
- We think that this proposal has some valuable self-policing aspects too – as a way of preventing frivolous demands for in-person meetings – when the requestor has no real business purpose in asking – OR if the proponent fails to show up, after asking a company to go to the additional expense of renting a hall just for them: If a requestor fails to show up after asking to attend in person, they should be barred from submitting any other shareholder-meeting proposal for at least three years.

So readers, we’d like to hear your thoughts on all this: email us at cthagberg@aol.com. ■

SOME NOTES ON THE MUCH-BASHED SYMANTEC VIRTUAL MEETING

As mentioned elsewhere in this issue, activist investors, the press, and assorted other “noisemakers” sure piled onto Symantec Corporation, following their first-ever totally virtual annual meeting.

We were kind of glad they did...first because it proved the point we tried to make to Tim Smith of Walden Asset Management in spades: That not only is there no place to hide in cyberspace, any real or perceived meeting missteps will surface and make the rounds in a cyber-second, so there is a built-in self-correction feature to VMs that can't be beat.

A second great thing about virtual meetings is that you can usually tune in the archived webcast, as we did here...and listen to any rough or questionable patches as often as you'd like...and make up your own mind about the overall fairness and effectiveness of the meeting, which we also did.

So here are a few observations which readers can check out for themselves – and a few suggestions for possible improvements next year:

When we logged on to the Symantec site, we were favorably impressed right off the bat – and a bit surprised in light of all the press coverage that made them sound like bad people – to note that they are on Fortune's Most Admired List and on Ethisphere's list of Most Ethical Companies.

We were a little disappointed that the pictures and names and business affiliations of the Directors were so small we couldn't see them clearly...and that we couldn't simply “click” on them, to enlarge them as they were “introduced”...but no big deal, really.

But oops! They did not really get introduced individually... and may or may not have been listening in...which was one of the major complaints. We were a bit surprised that Symantec either did not know, or simply forgot, that not having Directors attend the meeting is a major no-no with investors (remember the big flaps at Home Depot, Johnson Controls and Morgan Stanley when most directors failed to show a few years ago?) And it seemed particularly inexcusable to have no-shows at a virtual meeting, where all the Directors needed to do to “attend” was to boot up their computer or pick up the phone. We can be sure that like the three companies above, Symantec will not make that mistake again.

We're probably a bit biased here, but oops again...We were startled to hear that the Inspector of Election was the Corporate Secretary. While there appeared to be nothing at all that was controversial – until the noisemakers piped up, that is – not having a clearly neutral party as Inspector is hardly a best practice – especially when you're trying something new, like a VM.

The “business part” of the meeting – the election of directors, ratification of auditors and approval of increases in shares allocated to two equity incentive plans – was conducted briskly, efficiently and effectively, we thought...

and over in a blessedly brief nine minutes, although they made a minor misstep by closing the polls before the question period officially opened: Please note, dear readers, that this is really the only part of the meeting where questions MUST be entertained. The “general discussion” and any “open Q&A period” is solely at the discretion of the Chair, and almost always takes place AFTER the official meeting is officially adjourned. But the “window” for entering questions was open the entire time, and there were NO questions on the items being voted on, so no harm, no foul.

We found the CEO's presentation on the business – and on their strategy going forward – to be very well articulated and very well done overall. The slides that appeared on the side of the screen were well written and very much on-point – and properly forward-looking too, we thought...and this part lasted about 16 minutes.

As we've said on many other occasions, we are big fans of live “video streaming” – mainly in the hope that it will force the management team to come up with something that will hold the audience's attention better than slides. We've long opined that watching ANY annual meeting is like watching paint dry...and watching only slides is like watching already dry paint get drier. And we DO like to check out the body language, quirks, tics and other potential “tells” of the management speakers – especially when being questioned – and ideally, the reactions of directors too, which makes the meeting moderately more interesting. But hey... this meeting was at least partly about saving money on the meeting itself, and there were zero riveting moments expected (or actual) with such a routine agenda...so we'd issue a “pass” here: The streaming video, while not a fortune, is a lot more expensive than audio only.

Now for the really important questions that were raised about the meeting:

Do we think that Symantec intentionally tried to forestall difficult questions, or to “game” the question period to “mute dissident voices”? Absolutely not: It does seem, based solely on assertions from people who say they tried to email Qs and failed to get through, that there may have been some delays in transmission times over the web. But if you listen to the replay, there was ample notice that the question period was set to open...and a statement that so far, only the two questions that were answered had been received – plus ample notice – and what we considered to be more than ample waiting time – about 10 seconds – before the question period was closed.

Do we think that Symantec rephrased or paraphrased the questions in a “softball” manner as some of the questioners seemed to assert? Not at all: Their key question, asserting that Symantec “repeatedly failed to return shareholder value” and asking “what specifically does management intend to do to reverse losses over the years” seemed very clear and very blunt, at least to this listener. Interestingly, the answers to this question had actually been provided in the closing bullet-points of the CEO's prepared remarks, which did seem to us to throw the CEO off a tiny bit at first. But he re-stated the points he'd just made just fine, although perhaps not as neatly bulleted as earlier: The second question struck us as more of a complaint against the virtual-only format, and we at least, thought the answer was a decent one, and totally sincere; that as a technology company, they wanted to use technology, and that they would likely reach a much larger audience, as indeed they did. They certainly convinced US that they thought it would be a good idea, and that certainly, there was no malice aforesaid, as many of the "noisemakers" implied.

One still-open issue for virtual meetings in general: There is a very real and very understandable concern on the part of investors that questions will intentionally be re-phrased as "softballs" or shut-off too early – or that the really tough questions will somehow, inexplicably, get lost in cyberspace.

Intel, BestBuy and others have acknowledged that this is an issue that needs addressing: perhaps with a posted list of ALL the questions asked before and during the meeting...including the ones that were answered in the prepared remarks, questions that were duplicative of others to some extent and questions that were either not on point or just plain dopey.

Our own suggested best practice is that in addition to accepting questions over the web – both before and during the meeting – companies should also have an open phone line, where questioners can queue up – by hitting the star key – to ask a question on a first-come-first-served basis. This may actually generate a few "riveting moments" – some of which may need bleeping. But it seems well worth the effort – to achieve the desired "transparency" and to answer legitimate concerns about pre-screening – and to add a bit of suspense...and maybe a bit of drama too to a normally dull event. ■

HOW OFTEN SHOULD SHAREHOLDERS HAVE A SAY ON PAY? "GODDESSES OF GOVERNANCE" CONVINCED US THAT ANNUALLY IS BEST

It's not often that a panel discussion prompts us to change our mind on something like Say On Pay...especially after investor activist Ed Durkin of the Carpenters Union had persuaded us – and, apparently, the drafters of Dodd-Frank too – that a triennial Say On Pay was best. He argued, quite convincingly we thought, that it would allow investors to conduct much more high-quality analysis than they could possibly do with 13,000 or so annual SOP proposals to review, should an annual standard be mandated, and we thought it might give much-beleaguered proxy statement drafters a bit of a break too.

But at the Society's multi-chapter meeting in NYC on Sept. 30th, a panel of experts – whom moderator Bob Lamm of Pfizer aptly referred to as "goddesses of governance" – Hye-Won Choi, SVP Corporate Governance at TIAA-CREF, Suzanne Hopgood, Managing Director at the NACD, Polly Plimpton, Counsel at McDermott Will & Emery and Ann Yerger, Executive Director of the Council of Institutional Investors – managed to totally turn our thinking completely around.

First, as Hye-Won Choi pointed out, the annually required proxy statement disclosures are best aligned with an annual say on pay. And, as she also pointed out, companies make decisions about pay...not biennially... or triennially...but every single year.

Panelists also agreed with something we'd been pointing out since the SOP debate first began – that a thumbs-up on the Comp plan provides protection for the Comp Committee members, and for all the other directors too.

As Suzanne Hopgood noted, high Votes-No on pay serve as a very important warning sign to directors that something is amiss, somewhere, and needs addressing. (Interestingly, no one seemed to think that the old arguments that so many companies made, that Votes-No on pay are somehow too ambiguous to be useful, hold any water at all these days: Clearly, having seen three of them this season, an SOP thumbs-down sends a totally unambiguous message, just as we'd said all along.)

Ann Yerger, and Hye-Won as well, indicated that they would not automatically recommend a vote against a biennial or triennial SOP proposal – as long as the company had no governance issues – although both TIAA-CREF and the Council are officially in favor of annual SOP.

But panelists noted several other benefit of annual says on pay that are not immaterial ones: First, an annual say is much more likely to be treated routinely by voters, and more likely to get a "pass" from them they think, as do we. Second, biennial and triennial proposals leave the door open for counter-proposals from shareholders in subsequent years. Some activists are already thinking about proposals that would require companies to revert to annual SOP if the 2 or 3 year referendum yielded votes in excess of some percentage threshold. Last and far from least, as one panelist noted; why make the annual workload lighter for activists in the first place – especially if it means they may decide to scrutinize your pay proposal under a microscope in year two or three? An annual say on pay looks like the path to least resistance, for sure. P.S. Look for our practical tips for putting the Say When on Pay proposal(s) to a vote in our next issue...after the SEC regs are out. ■

TWO TA PROS WARN ON ABANDONED PROPERTY ISSUES, AND ON OVER-REACHING, UNDER-PERFORMING STATES

Hardly an Optimizer issue goes by without something new on the abandoned property scene:

- R&T President Tom Montrone warned readers of his latest newsletter to beware of claims from the State of California for penalties and interest on property that was never even escheated – but which had, apparently, been picked off a pre-escheatment report. R&T has also been getting totally unsupported claims for alleged late-filing penalties and fines, virtually all of which, he says, were found to be meritless after a proper investigation.
- Computershare’s Charlie Rossi also told the Society’s Western regional Conference that time-and-money-and-staff-strapped states have been sending formerly lost holders who’ve discovered that their property was escheated back to the T-A... who, of course, has nothing to give them back!

ELSEWHERE ON THE SUPPLIER SCENE:

CIBC-Mellon, Canada’s second largest transfer agent, and nearly tied for market share with Computershare Canada in what is essentially a duopoly there, has been sold to Pacific Equity Partners (PEP) the relatively new owner of US transfer agent AST. It will operate in Canada under the name of Canadian Stock Transfer Company (CST) and will, along with AST, become part of the North American Division of The Link Group, under the current AST CEO, Mark Healy. We are always surprised when a duopoly-company is sold, and we were even more surprised that BNY-Mellon – which owned half the business to begin with, and which certainly could have succeeded by bidding quite a bit less than PEP, to prevent “issues” for CIBC banking clients – reportedly, did not bid at all. The “premium” was incredibly rich, we hear – an offer that BNY-Mel “could not refuse”...plus, they say, the lion’s share of the old clientele will move to them...seamlessly. Time will tell...so we’ll plan to follow up in six months or so...But we’d also note that this opens new doors for Computershare Canada, even while it opens new doors for AST’s Phoenix Advisors vs. Computershare’s Georgeson business in Canada. The competitive merry-go-round continues to whirl like crazy...for sure.

Oh gee...it’s ESG! Governance Metrics International and The Corporate Library have merged, to create “the world’s leading independent firm dedicated to the development and sale of corporate governance risk ratings, environmental, social and corporate governance (ESG) advisory and analytical services; and a suite of online global governance information products and services for the investment market.” What a mouthful;

a globally-globular glob of global-good-governance-gobbledygook, we’re tempted to opine – but all this according to their July 22 press release. Good governance pioneers Howard Sherman and Gavin Anderson of GMI will join corporate librarians and governance pioneers from the get-go, Nell Minow and Robert A. G. Monks, along with Richard A. Bennett, John Higgins and Ric Marshall on the combined board. But both firms will keep their names and operate from their current headquarters in Portland Maine (the Library) and NYC. Three cheers for ESG! Who knew?

Meanwhile...little Proxy Governance Inc. (PGI) is “going to market” – forgive the bad pun – looking for “sponsors” that will allow the firm to offer proxy advisory advice to individual investors for free...allow mutual funds and other third-part investors and advisors to post voting advice on their site...allow investors, and public companies to appeal the posted advice, for a “non-burdensome” fee...and serve as an alternative to ISS, which is widely being damned these days as a big bad wolf. The new little PGI would then stand for the Proxy Governance Institute if funds can be found.

IRAlert...which had been offering “daily updates and analysis for Investor Relations Professionals” has folded, after 14 months of push-emailing mostly pre-paid content provided by vendors, framed by banner ads. Note to all the other folks in this overcrowded publishing space – and to their ad-buyers too: ALERT! “The financial math...simply does not add up” as the final issue noted. ■

THE OPTIMIZER COMMENTS ON THE PROXY PLUMBING RELEASE

Space constraints this quarter won't allow us to print the entire comment letter – though we tried hard to keep it as short and as simple as possible. And besides, the comments will be on the web before this issue hits the streets.

We urge you to read them, however – and to comment on your own – even if you miss the official deadline by a week or two...Here are a few highlights:

- Over-voting is real – and untenable: We tell the SEC exactly how to fix it.
- Vote Confirmations: Easy, but the real issue is to have systems that have integrity – and that are readily auditable: We endorse the longstanding proposal to drop VIFs and issue proxies to all.
- Fees: “It’s time for people to put their money where their mouths are”: We ask again for a long-overdue re-bidding of the 1985 contract, including a decoupling of the “name aggregation” duties from all other elements, so issuers can choose vendors based on their own specific needs.

- Communications: Replace the outmoded NOBO/OBO designations to give shareowners a much wider choice of options as to what they can receive, and how: Recognize that most shareowners have no problem with issuers knowing who they are...under conditions of the owners’ own choosing. Most important; allow short “executive summaries” of voting items to accompany the Notice – and give people the ability to vote then and there if they feel they have all the info they need... ■

PEOPLE:

Chris Cernich (write that name down) the new Director of M&A and Proxy-contest Research at Institutional Shareholder Services (ISS) was the subject of a lengthy profile, cum color photo, in the WSJ this quarter, headlined “Going From Used Cars to Proxy Battles.” Aside from his used car expertise, he holds a PHD in English lit, and the former prof has also had a successful career designing and building “art furniture”...so we’d expect proxy fights to be a snap for this sort-of-Renaissance-man.

Broadridge Financial Solutions CEO Richard Daly is being honored by Fountain House, the world’s largest provider of rehabilitative services for people with serious mental illnesses, at its annual Celebration of Life event on Nov. 15th at the Citi Executive Center in NYC where he will receive the Esther Montanez Leadership Award. For over 17 years, beginning at ADP, Rich’s firm has been employing 5-12 Fountain House members each week, many of whom have graduated from the “Transitional Employment Program” to “supported” and ultimately to full-time employment. The event also marks the 10th anniversary of Fountain Gallery, which Rich, and Broadridge have also supported from the beginning. For info and tickets, visit www.fountainhouse.org.

Salli Marinov, the President and CEO of First American Stock Transfer Company in Phoenix, AZ has published a very useful book, now available at www.amazon.com entitled A Practical Guide for the Transfer of U.S. Equity Securities: Basic Principles & Procedures. Readers, if you are responsible for Stock Transfer Agency services, or if you deal with shareholders, transfer agents or stock plan service providers at a publicly traded company – or if you work with any Wall Street people, for that matter – this is an invaluable desk reference and training aid. An easy read, the glossary alone is worth the modest purchase price.

NIRI has elected Douglas R. Wilburne, VP Investor Relations at Textron Inc., as the 2011 NIRI Board Chairman. Top priorities for Wilburne, he says, are membership growth, deepening NIRI advocacy and professional development activities and conducting and acting upon an in-depth strategic review of NIRI activities. ■

QUOTE OF THE QUARTER:

“Board members like nothing better than a good executive summary. Boards crave them. Whenever you can do it, it’s welcome. If you have someone on your staff who is good at writing them, hang on to them.”

– Anne M. Mulcahy, former Chairman & CEO, Xerox Corporation – Speaking at the 2010 Multi-Regional Fall Conference in NYC.

REGULATORY NOTES...and comment

ON THE HILL: Consideration of whether to extend or modify or repeal the “Bush tax cuts” on dividends, capital gains and inheritances has been postponed until after the fall elections, which, we think, increases the chances that they will be extended – at least for all but the highest 3-5% of income earners...which would be a good thing, for sure.

AT FASBI: Russell Golden, the former technical director has been appointed to the Board, following the retirement of the long-serving and very well thought of Chairman Robert Hertz while the Board looks for a new Chairman and one more board member. It is anticipated that Golden’s appointment will allow the many projects that FASBI has underway to continue without interruption while the search for a new Chairman continues...something we surely hope for.

AT FINRA: A nice fat $1 million fine against Trillium Brokerage Services, for flooding the markets 46,000 times in 2006 and 2007 with “illegitimate orders” – entered with the intent of cancelling them – in order to trick other market participants by making prices rise and fall “artificially” while Trillium booked $575,000 in profits. Nice move, FINRA...but it sounds to us to be exactly what happened (among other things) in the Flash-Crash of 2010...with no fines pointed or penalties imposed to date!

AT THE SEC: Just as we were about to hit the send button to our layout person, came news that the SEC has granted a stay of its new Proxy Access Rules, pending what we hope will be a greatly expedited hearing by the DC Court of Appeals. A HUGE waste of valuable time and money, we say, instigated by the Business Roundtable and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, and merely dragging out the inevitable outcome in any case...although we’re sort of happy to see our good friend Amy Goodman and her colleagues at Gibson Dunn get such fascinating, fun-making and financially rewarding work. The gripe? The SEC “failed to engage in evidence-based rulemaking...We intend to hold the SEC to its statutory obligation to conduct a thorough cost-benefit analysis” said the head of the Chamber’s Litigation Center. Even a bad lawyer can make up a plausible cost-benefit analysis to prove anything, we say... especially when the “benefit” is as soft and squishy, but as inarguably important as “shareholder rights”...And who can really prove the analysis is wrong? And, btw, aren’t the plaintiffs here the very same folks who HATE the plaintiff’s bar? The latest poop: Probably NO Access for 2011 given the likely timetable for the “expedited review.”

Yet another dud hits the ground, following the joint “bomb-drop” from the SEC and the CFTC on the causes of the Flash-Crash: Yep, it does seem plausible that a single trading strategy by a single trading firm went “on autopilot into a ravine” as CFTC chairman Gary Gensler observed – and actually, their model made them speed up continually, the closer to crashing they came. But, as still-spooked market makers were quick to observe, the report failed to adequately address the much broader spectrum of events that ensued...and thus, fell way short on solutions that would prevent future flash-crashes. “The trigger is a small part of the story” one trader correctly observed; “and we should keep in mind that a trigger is not a cause.” Note to the SEC & CFTC: Second-quarter trading volumes were down 25% vs. last year...and investors of every stripe have been dumping equities like crazy post flash-crash. Also: see the FINRA story above, and see the Sept 2 New York Times article reporting that on Feb 18th 89.7 billion of the 1.24 billion shares that were “traded” on NASDAQ were actually cancelled because, likely, they were faked, as a way to fool the crowd...a practice widely known as “quote stuffing.”

IN THE COURTHOUSE: Hewlett Packard settled its lawsuit against Oracle and HP’s old CEO Mark Hurd – after ousting Hurd, handing him a fat severance package with few or no strings attached, telling the press a story that just would not add up, or go away, then suing him after Oracle hired him on, after loud jibes about the HP board’s ineptitude from Oracle’s CEO – and from IBM’s too – and near-universal doubts about HP’s ability to enforce a non-compete...then, taking back about half the bye-bye comp they’d initially awarded (a mere bag’a shells, as they say) as the “settlement” ...all in the space of two short weeks. Worst Board in America, we’d have to say...and we sure HOPE there’s none worse still lurking out there. ■

THOUGHT FOR THE MONTH: from the Oracle of Omaha

“Risk comes from not knowing what you’re doing.”
– Warren Buffett

WATCHING THE WEB:

The Subcommittee on Proxy Reform of the Securities Transfer Association has launched a website encouraging individuals and public companies to comment on the SEC concept release on proxy plumbing: Go to www.reformtheproxyssystem.com for an amusing cartoon and somewhat ‘over the top’ comments on the current state of affairs, like “Stop the Madness...Influence the Vote”
